Polly whistled as she walked down the road toward her yoga class. She loved it, even if half of the girls there thought she had no right to exercise because she was a big girl. She knew it was her right to be healthy and do anything she liked though, and decided that the other girls would just have to deal with her big, beautiful body in her tight yoga leotard just like she had to deal with theirs. It's not like they were the most spectacular sight to see either, bending and twisting with their faces in ridiculous expressions and completely missing the point of the meditations.
Oh well, they weren't her problem. She wasn't about to let her enlightenment get messed up because of a few judgmental bitches hanging around the place. They could whisper and stare all they wanted, she was going to do whatever she liked, and keep her body healthy. She found it the most ultimate irony when fat girls were judged at the gym. They were there to better themselves and exercise and stay healthy, what more could those idiots ask for?
