This journey was taking a lot longer than she had expected. She had known the approximate time in days, but hadn't counted on the hours to feel so long. Pa was watering the horses, and Ma was in the back of the wagon, shuffling around to fix supper. They would be in their new home soon. In the meantime, this would be her life for the next who knew how long.

That night, they made a campfire and sat together, eating beans and telling stories. When they finished eating, Pa took out his fiddle and played some songs so they could dance or sing along if they felt like it. Rachel wasn't particularly enthusiastic, but she could never resist a chance to make her Pa smile, so she danced and sang with her mother until it was time for bed.

As she lay on her makeshift bed, she listened to the wolves howling. Goosebumps crept across her flesh, and she wished she had someone to hold her close like her parents had each other. It was a scary world out there, and even though she knew they could handle anything, it didn't keep her from getting nervous.

On nights like this, she sure wished she could have someone to hold her tight until the morning. It was a wild world out there, and nobody could predict what might happen next. Moving across the country was the biggest adventure she had ever been on, and she couldn't honestly say that she enjoyed it all that much. It was nice to see the new lands, and be out under the stars though.
